[Numb. 853.]

THE South-Carolina Gazette.

From Monday September 10th, to Monday September 17th, 1750.

The Abridgment of a Voyage round the World; by George Anson, Esq; continued from N°. 846, 849, 850, and 852.

THE Centurion and Glouceſter left the coaſt of America the 6th of May, 1742. The firſt land in Aſia which they could reach was the iſlands Ladrones, which are ſeparated from America by near one third of the globe's circumference. But as the N. E. winds, which are favourable for this voyage, uſually blow between the tropics, the Engliſh could not think that they could be longer about it than the Spaniards, who generally perform it in two months. In this confidence they put to ſea, and ſtood for the latitude where the moſt regular winds are expected; but, contrary to their expectations, the wind ſhifted ſo often, and they had ſo many ſtrong gales at W. that, in 7 weeks, they had not proceeded one fourth of the voyage. Several misfortunes happen'd during this tedious delay. Both ſhips ſprung their maſts in ſeveral places, and being obliged to keep their pumps continually going, on account of the leaks, it was an inſupportable fatigue to the men, the greateſt part of whom were weakened by the ſcurvy.

Tho' they had plenty of proviſions, and tho' the rains conſtantly ſupplied them with water, and all poſſible care was taken to keep the ſhips cool and clean; yet the ſcurvy continued its havock, notwithſtanding all their ſkill and precaution: and even when the fair winds ſet in towards the end of June, the voyage was far from being ſo ſpeedy as might have been hoped. The Glouceſter, having loſt her main maſt, ſail'd heavily, and the Centurion loſt near a month in waiting for her. When they were within 300 leagues of the port, the Glouceſter's other maſts were all carried away by ſome contrary gales, nor were her crew any longer able to free her of water; ſo that on the 15th of Auguſt, having taken out the moſt neceſſary ſtores, they ſet her on fire; and on the 23d they made ſome iſlands, which were the firſt that they had ſeen during this long paſſage; and on the 26th, while they were regretting the apparent difficulty of landing at any of theſe, and fearing they ſhould not get ſight of any others, they diſcovered 3 more. Of one of theſe, a boat, which they had taken, gave them ſuch an inviting account, that they immediately ſet about landing their men. The ſick, who were now grown very numerous, were, without delay, put on ſhore, being carried on the ſhoulders even of their officers, their humane Commodore ſetting the example. Here they recover'd ſurpriſingly, ſo that all the time they ſtay'd, they loſt but 10 men. Their quick recovery was owing to the acid fruits and anti-ſcorbutic plants, as well as to the healthful qualities of the air. Beaſts, fowls, and vegetables were here in great abundance; and tho' there was no river, this defect was amply ſupply'd by ſeveral reſervoirs of excellent water, iſſuing from the ſprings. But, as the fineſt countries are ſubject to ſome inconveniences, ſo was this delightful iſland of Tinian. The chief is, the want of harbours, for there is but one place where ſhips can anchor, which is to the S. E. and this, from the middle of June to the middle of October, is expoſed to very furious tempeſts, which blow at the new and full moons. The coral, which ſpreads all over the bottom of the ſea, wounds the cables, ſo that they eaſily part in a ſtrong current, or hard gale. This the Centurion experienced on the 22d of September, when a ſtrong guſt of wind broke both her cables, and drove her from the coaſt, ſo that it was 19 days before ſhe could get back again. As the greateſt part of the ſhip's company was on ſhore with Mr. Anſon, only 108 men were on board, and moſt of them ſickly. This was a number ſo unequal to the working of the pumps, and at the ſame time navigating the ſhip, that it was impoſſible for them to bring her ſooner back to the iſland, where indeed ſhe had been given over for loſt. The Commodore, who at firſt ſhew'd no ſigns of uneaſineſs, was unable to conceal the emotion of his mind, when, ſome days after the ſhip's departure, he perceived 2 boats, which at firſt he imagined to belong to the Centurion, and feared that the ſhip was foundered, and that the perſons who had ſaved themſelves in theſe boats, were all that remained of the crew. This conjecture, but eſpecially the apprehenſion that all the expected glory and advantage of his hazardous expedition was irretrievably prevented, affected him ſo ſtrongly that he retired to his tent, that he might have no witneſſes to the grief and anguiſh which he could no longer ſuppreſs. Except this ſingle inſtance of human frailty, which ſome perſons have inſolently cenſured, his conſtancy, his prudence, his ſerenity, and alacrity, juſtly excite our aſtoniſhment, and deſerve our imitation: and from this he ſoon recover'd, reſuming his uſual chearfulneſs. He told his men, that, as the ſhip had not been able to regain the iſland, it was probable that ſhe was gone for Chili, and that the only means which remained to meet her there, was to ſaw the boat which they had taken, through the middle, and lengthen it, ſo that it might be large enough to carry them all. He not only exhorted them to this work, but, to encourage them in forwarding it, he himſelf condeſcended to be a workman. Moſt of the ſhip's carpenters happening to be on the iſland, they ſoon got tools and materials ready to join the two ends of the boat, when, on the 11th of October, the ſhip again appeared, and put an end at once to their labour and apprehenſions. Mr. Anſon immediately went on board, with the greateſt part of his men; and tho', ſome days after, ſhe was again driven off, the crew, being now ſtronger, brought her back into the road in five days. The ſailors who had been left on ſhore, had already begun to refit the boat, which would conveniently have held their ſmall number. But being at laſt once more got all together, they left this iſland, where they had experienced the greateſt viciſſitudes of joy and conſternation. This laſt trip proved more proſperous, and they arrived at Macao on the 12th of December, which was the firſt friendly port they had ſeen during two years. The Portugueſe governor ſhew'd himſelf both a weak counſellor and a timorous friend. For tho' he was inclined to favour Mr. Anſon, his ſelfiſh dependence on the Chineſe hinder'd him from doing it effectually. He adviſed him againſt going to Canton, to avoid a diſpute with the inhabitants, who not being uſed to ſee ſhips of that force, would inſiſt upon the ſame fees which merchant ſhips paid, and from which a man of war might juſtly think itſelf exempt. Upon receiving this account, the Commodore ſail'd to a ſmall port called Typa, and here he was put to infinite trouble in procuring neceſſaries from the Chineſe, becauſe they are ſtrictly attached, by their intereſt, to the Spaniards of Manilla. They regarded the Engliſh Commodore as no better than a powerful pirate, and this, joined with the perfidy of their Mandarines, the venality of their courts of juſtice, and the fraud of their traders, occaſion'd delay after delay, in fitting their ſhip, and buying the neceſſary ſtores and proviſions. Mr. Anſon, out of patience at being thus amuſed and retarded, was at length convinced that reſolution and threatenings availed more than courteſy and preſents. Accordingly, having, at length, procured the ſhip to be refitted and victualled, he left Typa the 6th, and Macao the 19th of April, 1743. Mr. Anſon, when he was about to leave this port, had given out that he was going to return to Europe; and, tho' this ſeem'd impracticable at that ſeaſon, by reaſon of the weſtern monſoon, he had made his men believe, that, in confidence of their ſkill, and the goodneſs of the ſhip, he would venture to attempt it: for he was perſuaded that, if his intention upon the Manilla galleon had taken wind at Macao, the Spaniards would have been ſoon apprized of it by their Chineſe friends. But, notwithſtanding all his precaution to keep at ſuch a ſtance from the Philippine iſlands as not to be perceived, they had often ſight of him; and the governor of Manilla, at the inſtances of the merchants, had reſolved to ſend out ſome ſhips of force againſt him. But the contrary winds, the ſlowneſs in fitting out the largeſt ſhip, and eſpecially the diſſenſions among the proprietors, happily retarded this expedition. Nor was this the only ſcheme which proved abortive; for when the Centurion was repairing at Typa, and conſequently unable to make any defence, ſome Spaniards had form'd a deſign to ſend thither a kind of fireſhip, in order to deſtroy her. But tho' no more than 40,000 crowns was required for an action which would have ſaved a million, the merchants, ſuſpecting the governor's view was only to get the money into his hands, could not be brought to advance it; and thus the Engliſh owed the ſafety of their ſhip to the miſtruſt and parſimony of their enemies.
